

The End of the Bronze Age as a Message for Our Time

There are so many different things we hear and read on television and newspapers; items that seem unrelated. We hear about ebola in Africa, sanctions against Russia and Iran, we heard about decapitations by ISIS-terrorists of the Islamic State, droughts in some areas of the world and heavy rain in other areas and very cold winters in parts of the US. We hear about China becoming more and more a dominant player in the world, problems in the financial world, just to mention a few.

But maybe all these events are in a certain sense related, more than it seems at first glance. An eye-opener for me was the book '1177 BC. The Year Civilization Collapsed', researched and written by prof. Eric Cline.

He investigated thoroughly the situation in the countries that border the Mediterranean Sea and the Middle East around the year 1177 BC. The reason was that in the decades around this date the great civilization of the Bronze Age fell apart in an eerie speed, especially in the two decades following 1177 BC.

Cline did choose this year because in this year we saw a historic battle, maybe even a decisive battle. A battle that was not only the result of a chain of important historic developments, the battle itself was part of developments that led to the total collapse of a great and vast civilization.

As there are eerie parallels between the decades around 1177 BC and our time, I used astrological cycles to compare both times, and the results are stunning.
